[The sense of many of its nam. appl., as of other pr., depends either on the context, or on some s. orig. used with it, but now dropped except in full construction, and cannot, therefore, be clearly defined by equiv. words. Its prim. sense is, however, preserved everywhere.] See At, By, On, Within, &c.

‖ Im-, equiv. to in or into. See In-. ¶ Im-, equiv. to not. See In-. [1] Im-, intensive or expletive. See In-.

In-, pfx. It is either (1) equiv. to in, into, within, or among, or (2), and much more freq., it acts as a negative or a privative (= not [somet. better rend. by beyond, or surpassing, added to the s.], or un-), denying the qual. or cond., or impl. the want or absence of the state expr. by the words to wh. it is added. In both cases, like en-, de-, and dis-, it (3) not unfreq. serves merely to augment or render emphatic the sense of the word to wh. it is pfxd; and thus, when joined to words already neg. or priv., it is somet. expletive or useless. It prop. occurs only in words taken direc. from the Latin, or wh. are formed in imit. of them; just as en- is presumed to occur only in those borrowed direc. from the Fr. or Gr. This distinc., however, has never been strictly observed, and some words in wh. its signif. is positive (1 or 3) are written indif. with either pfx, even by the best authorities; the ear, rather than the deriv., appearing, in these cases, to guide the writers. The euphonic var. of in- are—ig- (always neg.), il- (bef. l), im- (bef. a labial), and ir- (bef. r). The meaning of most of the resul. comp. is self-evid. as soon as the charac. of the pfx. —pos. or neg., is known. 69. See Dis-, En-, Un-, &c. [For words not found under In-, and its var., seek under En-, em-, or un-. For formatives omitted after their v., a., &c., and for the fig. pron. in full, refer to the prim. word.]
